

Career Bliss
March 28, 2014

CareerBliss' Best of the Web offers you a weekly roundup of the newest insight found around the web to help our CareerBliss community navigate through the toughest terrains of job search, resumes, negotiation and success! Check back every Friday to boost your job search IQ!

We handpick a few of the best, most interesting pieces of advice published for your weekend reading pleasures:

1. The New Science of Email Subject Lines, (The Wall Street Journal)

"I always find the content line YOU makes people open up fast," says Tina Brown, the former magazine editor and founder of next month's Women in the World Summit, for which she wrangled notables like IMF chief Christine Lagarde, former President Jimmy Carter and actress Meryl Streep.

2. Which Companies Actually Hire Interns, (LinkedIn Blog)

Thinking about getting an internship? LinkedIn data analysts looked at how many members went from intern to full-time employee at the same company. Then, highlighted the top companies that are most often hire interns by industry.

3. How to Close an Interview with Class, (Forbes)

"Based on my background and the skills and experience we discussed, how well do I fit the profile of the candidate for which you're looking?" This question will help you find out what the hiring manager thinks of your background and whether or not they believe you're a good fit.

4. To Land a Job, Know How Employers Use Technology to Hire, (Huffington Post)

A good, thorough refresher on the latest tools employers are using to hire. This post can help you make sure you're getting seen by hiring employers!

5. Five Ways to Get Job Recruiters to Come to You, (Business Insider)

Good tip: "Try to refer potential job candidates to recruiters so that you get on their radar and they think of you when a job becomes available."

